TRAINING THE REFORMERS

Leadership and Management skills

How can these skills be taught at different stages of G.P. training?

Thoughts from Y&H Trainers, TDP's, other Educators and First Five representatives

Taking leadership forwards in Yorkshire and the Humber

Introduction

Medical leadership is a hot topic but how best to teach this is as yet unknown. At the School of Primary Care in Yorkshire and the Humber, a set of trainable skills have been developed from the leadership domains set out in the Medical Leadership Competency Framework. These skills are grouped, (1) listening, feedback and reflection; (2) organisational skills; (3) working in teams; (4) dealing with conflict and pressure and (5) improving services.

In order to assess trainee and educator perceptions as to what leaderships skills are currently being taught and their relative importance, a Deanery-wide survey was conducted. Respondents also gave examples of teaching that they had experienced within each skill set.

52 trainees and 55 educators responded. Across all 5 skill sets the educators reported they were facilitating more teaching than trainees perceived was happening. The most striking discrepancy was coping with pressure where 84% of educators felt that this topic was taught whereas only 44% of trainees felt they had received teaching. Interesting trainee/educator discrepancies in perceived importance of skills included, using analytical tools, evaluating the impact of services and managing conflict. Examples of teaching included debrief, case based discussion, videos and multi-source feedback.

The overwhelming message was that developing leadership skills was seen as an important part of training and was already happening, although not badged as such. Our next steps are to raise awareness and develop a learning community in which the experience of teaching leadership is collated as a communal national resource.

The following table (or GRID) has been developed by a working group in Yorkshire and the Humber demonstrating where in many cases leadership education is already occurring and where there may be scope for future training developments.

First five GP's have suggested addressing leadership generically at any regional trainee conferences held, and suggested that a buddying/ mentoring scheme for trainees towards the end of their training, or in first five, could increase confidence, and improve performance by new G.P's in leadership and management.
